

ASIEN 50 (Januar 1994)

Abstract

The role of Japanese foreign direct investment and technology transfer in South Korean economic development strategies in the 1980's and beyond

Patrick Köllner

After a look at South Korea's economic development policy since the end of the military regime of General Park Chung-hee, the author highlights some aspects of the inter-relationship between this country's economic development strategies and ensuing government technology transfer on the one hand and the inflow of Japanese direct investment on the other.